

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

Full Episode Transcript

With Your Host

Búa Victoria Albina, NP, MPH

Feminist Wellness with Búa Victoria Albina, NP, MPH

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

This is Feminist Wellness, and I'm your host, Nurse Practitioner, somatics and nervous system nerd, and life coach Béa Victoria Albina. I'll show you how to get unstuck, drop the anxiety, perfectionism, and codependency so you can live from your beautiful heart. Welcome, my love, let's get started.

Hello, hello my love. I hope this finds you doing so well. This week on the pod, we are talking about how to live with compassion and look backwards towards your past self with more care, more empathy, more kindness. One of the most heartbreaking things I hear from my clients every single week is, "God, I was so dumb. Oh, I can't believe I did that. I can't believe I went back to him. I can't believe I stayed with them. I can't believe I..." Meanie meanie meanie pants towards past us. Past you.

And there's this part of us that thinks if we beat ourselves up enough, then we won't make the same mistakes again, but it just doesn't make science. And it doesn't make anybody feel any more better. And listen, I love to say that if being mean to yourself worked, it would have worked by now, right? But it doesn't. It doesn't work. It doesn't get us anywhere except dysregulated in our nervous system, contracted and tight and braced somatically in our bodies. It binds us up. It locks us up. Go be mean to yourself and see how your digestion is. Go for it. I'll wait. Right?

So this episode is a clarion call to compassion. And I'm sharing it this week because as you may know, we are in the pre-order period for my first book, End Emotional Outsourcing: How to Overcome Your Codependent, Perfectionist, and People-Pleasing Habits, which you can get at my website at BeatrizAlbina.com/book.

And I wrote the book because, well, so many reasons, but herein, I wasn't seeing compassion for our past selves. I was seeing a lot of meanness, a lot of blaming, a lot of shaming, a lot of making ourselves feel bad for what we did in the past when we didn't know how else to live. We didn't know how else to relate. We didn't know that there was another option. We didn't have non-emotional outsourcing living modeled for us. Right? So of course we behaved in these ways. How could we not have? Right?

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

And yet, we stand here in the present moment, in the here and now, with all this knowledge, all this learning, all this growth, and we throw stones at past us? Come on now. At its core, emotional outsourcing is about not trusting yourself, right? Not having positive self-regard. So what exactly are you doing when you're unkind to past you but creating negative self-regard? The math isn't mathing, babies. And so, we need more compassion. More compassion, more compassion, more compassion, always.

All right. I could go on forever. Compassion is one of the things I love to talk about, teach about, coach about, and it's such a huge part of the book. So I really do hope that you'll go pre-order a copy for yourself, perhaps a wee stack to share with your friends and families. If you're a coach, send them to your clients. If you're a holistic health practitioner, send them to your patients. Like my goodness, what a beautiful welcome present. Give them to your family at the holidays. you know, hint, hint.

But really, I have lots of gifties on my website, BeatrizAlbina.com/book for folks who buy one book, 5 to 10 books. If you buy more than that, holler at us. We've got lots and lots of treats and presents for you. There's a whole book club guide that I would love to share with you when you place a bulk book club order. I'm just really grateful anytime anyone orders the book because it took me years to write, even more years to learn everything I had to learn to be able to conceive of the things I wrote in the book. So it truly has been a labor of love, and I want to get it out into as many hands as possible. So please pre-order now, spread the word, and enjoy this episode. Loving your past self, living with compassion.

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

So today I want to talk about the concept of our past self. When we start to learn to live in a new way, that it's possible to ditch our old codependent, perfectionist, and people-pleasing thought habits, it's super common to get really down on ourselves. We coach on this a lot in Anchored. It's a whole thing for sure. We beat ourselves up when we learn new things, new ways of being. We forget that we, you know, just learned it. And we don't give ourselves the grace for being new at something.

We have this habit of speaking to and thinking of ourselves in such unkind and even cruel ways. We are often mean to ourselves for not knowing what we didn't know before we knew it, which often comes from both the codependent story that we're not worthy or good enough, or else we'd already know everything and everyone else must know this, and at the end of the day, we were probably too broken to know it anyway.

We think this way and treat ourselves this way from the perfectionist thought fantasy that tells that same old story that we're supposed to know all the things all the time and that something is wrong with us for not being all-knowing.

We are so focused on the things we should have done, the things we think we could have done better before we knew how to do them better. We get so focused on the things we don't see as successes, see as failures in a bad way, versus failure in a good way, which we talk about in episodes 39 and 40, and we're cruel to ourselves. And in so doing, we walk around the world with blinders on to how amazing we really are. All the amazing things we are doing, all the ways we are succeeding and growing, and we brush those successes aside and move steadily along to self-flagellation from the story that we're never good enough.

So our brain says, why celebrate ourselves at all if we're not 127.43% perfect? And in that, we create so much shame for ourselves. Where shame is the belief that there's something inherently wrong with us. And not knowing what we didn't yet know is evidence of that in our unmanaged minds. And that shame keeps us from being present with ourselves and those we love, from celebrating, from continuing to grow, and from thoughtfully evaluating why we didn't do what we meant to or said we wanted to do.

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

And shame is the most massive success blocker ever, the most rigid and unyielding barrier to self-love, to taking risks and possibly failing, and thus growing, and it simultaneously blocks us from seeing how we're getting in the way of our own success. What a cluster cuss, am I right?

This habit of beating up on our past selves and thinking unkind thoughts about the you you were yesterday or 5 years ago or 50 years ago, these thoughts become part of our self-concept, the story we tell about ourselves. And that's where this gets super problematic for making future change because you're telling the story as you beat yourself up for your past decisions that you're a kind of person who fails in a certain way, instead of seeing that you've just been operating from your programming and acting a set of behaviors likely based in your survival skills from childhood, which are running in the background on autopilot. And most of us don't know to pause, to connect with our inner children, to reparent ourselves, more on the inner child and reparenting in episodes 22, 25, and 153.

So we don't know to pause and connect with those little kiddos inside who've been keeping you, who've been keeping us in the same old narratives and beliefs, the same old somatic or bodily stories in our nervous systems that drove our past actions. You were going from an old script. So of course you did what you did, my love. Of course you dated that emotionally unavailable person or were the emotionally unavailable person in a relationship. Of course you said yes when you actually wanted to say no. Of course you did whatever you now wish you hadn't done because you were the version of you you were then. And now, you're the version of you who knows how to do it differently.

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

And when you decide who you inherently are is based on your past self, you block growth, create shame, and remain stagnant in that old self-concept story. It's like labeling ourselves as codependent, which we don't do around here because it blocks change. When a label or story feels like a fixed part of your core identity, then that's all you can ever imagine yourself being.

Versus stepping into a self-loving growth mindset from which you can understand that your past codependent, perfectionist, people-pleasing thinking are sets of survival skills that did you right for so long until they didn't. And that you were doing the best you could with everything you learned in childhood from your family of origin, from what was modeled from you, from your socialization and conditioning, from growing up like we all did in the patriarchy and white settler colonialism, and labeling ourselves in these ways is so likely to leave you feeling stuck and forever screwed. It's just who I am, says this thinking. And my beauty, my darling tender ravioli, I'm not buying it.

You are so capable of change. The neuroplasticity of our minds is evidence of that. You can change your thinking. You can change your somatic or bodily experience of life and your nervous system responses. And not only am I living proof of that, the hundreds of women who've gone through Anchored, whose transformation stories you've been hearing on the show lately, are also proof positive of that, which is why I'm sharing them. You truly can change. And hating on your past self is not going to facilitate that change. It's only going to continue blocking it because science, my nerds.

When we are cruel to our past self, we're not giving ourselves the grace. We are robbing ourselves of compassion, curiosity, and care. And what we're doing is staying in self-judgment instead of leaning into self-acceptance, which is key to owning who you were and what you did, so you can look at those past behaviors. You can look them right in the snout and can say, "No more. Basta. I'm doing this in a different way, starting now."

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

And you can't know that you want to change your past ways if you're not looking at it.

And when we wallow in being mean to ourselves, we are out of acceptance, which keeps us out of making positive change. And inherent in that judgment of self is so much moralistic, all or nothing thinking. We decide that some things are morally okay or good and some things are bad, which strengthens the stories the patriarchy loves to reinforce, like the narratives around how good girls, good women, good wives, moms, partners behave, which is generally to put ourselves last for sure. Stories like that thinness is imperative for lovability, which means that eating certain things is good or bad, which makes us good or bad for eating them. Thereby that fries are a sign of moral failing and a side salad is the marker of making good and worthy choices, and here's the kicker. Choices that prove your worth.

And from that way of thinking, how can you possibly decide what's actually good for you, what you actually want, what truly serves you if you're looking at your choices through a moralistic lens that was taught to you by oppressive systems?

Learning to be kind to our past and present self does not mean you don't change or grow. It just means you stop identifying with the person you were as a forever identity.

There are two things I like to share on this. You know I love my metáfora. In the romance languages, we have two forms of the verb to be. In Spanish, my native language, those are ser and estar. They both mean to be, but they have different flavors to them. So ser is what you are in this unchangeable way. So for example, a ver, "Yo soy de Mar del Plata, Argentina." I am from Mar del Plata, Argentina. And sorry, it really cracked me up with that accent. "Mar del Plata, Argentina."

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

And the other is estar, which are the things that you are that are mutable and changeable. So like, I used to estar in Brooklyn and now estoy in the Hudson Valley. Changed and changeable. And we all have the option to look at our lives, the choices we've made, the ways we've shown up through the lens of estar. Not permanent things about who we are, just who we were being then, who we were estando or being in that moment.

And when we can look back on our lives and we can look at our past self through that lens, we can give ourselves so much grace, so much space to choose in this present moment, how we want to think about our past selves, remembering that when you look back on your past and see yourself in the most unkind way possible, then everything feels so loaded and heavy. And of course your brain will make your past choices mean bad things about you versus just being the things you did with the skills you had at the time.

So right now, my darling, my perfect little pancake, you can choose to remind yourself that you were doing the best you could in that very moment and can remember that it does nothing, exactly 0.0 things, to make your life better to look back on your past self in a harsh and critical way. And in fact, nerd alert, if we take a nervous system view, which you know I'm always gonna, when we look back on our past self with critical mean eyes versus lovingly evaluative eyes, we take ourselves out of ventral vagal, which is the safe and secure part of our nervous system, and we jack ourselves up into sympathetic activation or we drop ourselves down into dorsal, which is the checked out freeze response.

So we either get all anxious and worried and, "Oh my God, I did this thing and I'm having all these thoughts about it and about myself and I'm beating myself up and I'm all stressed about it." or, because that was sympathetic, that was fight or flight, or we drop down into dorsal. And we go into that place of checked out, sad, depressed, disconnected, isolating, unable to make change.

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

And what's important to know is we're not going to be able to make change and do things differently the next time unless we're in ventral vagal about it, unless we're in that grounded, safe, and secure part of our nervous system with ourselves and about ourselves. And that being in ventral vagal is facilitated greatly by being in acceptance of what was versus being in moralistic judgment of ourselves.

Because the next time you go to take whatever action, to say whatever you want to say, if your immediate thought, if the neural groove immediately firing and thus your immediate somatic bodily nervous system response is, "Oh man, I can't mess it up the way I messed it up before," or, "Well, I'm just going to mess it up as usual," then you're priming yourself to do just that versus finding your way through somatic practices like the ones we do in Anchored each and every week to get into right relationship with yourself, with past you, so you can make different choices now from a grounded nervous system.

I'll also share one of my absolute favorite Spanish things and I do love the Spaniards and all of their lisping. Olá, I am Silvia from España. I love their lisp. And just by the way, I don't sound like a Spaniard in Spanish. Por favor. I sound very Argentine. It's very different.

But there is this fabulous saying, "You can't kiss the same girl twice." Isn't that so great? I mean, think about it, right? Every kiss changes you. Every moment in life changes you. So you can't kiss the same girl twice because that girl is forever changed. And now that I'm hearing myself out loud, let's be more feminist. You cannot kiss the same woman twice. I must say it irks me when people call grown women girls. But anyway, there's a similar saying, you can't cross the same river twice because the river is always moving. It's always changing.

So whichever metaphor works for you, think of your own life as that ever-moving river, that ever-changing experience of being you. You are now changed. You're not the same person you were 10, 15 minutes ago. And so you now have the option of living in a new way and you have a new lens for thinking about your past decisions and your past choices. And this is where you get to do thought work to consciously make the next right choice for yourself. And for me, that next right choice is never beating past me up for doing the best she could with what she knew when she knew it. I was just operating from my nervous system programming, which, let's please remember that original programming largely happens ages 0 to 7, right? So when you're beating past you up, you're kind of beating up children. That's not cool, right? Come on.

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

I can recognize that in the past, past me was making the best choices I could from my own attachment wounding, which we talked about in episodes 129 and 135, and I was making the next right choice from the information I had, the skills and tools I had, the somatic capacity in my nervous system I had at that moment.

A thing that just came to me is this, and this is super important. I never know. You never know what growth will come from a decision you made in the past that you don't like right now. You just can't begin to know how it's all going to play out. And by hating on those past choices, we're declaring that we do, in fact, know what the future holds, which is not only not possible, it's a further block to our growth because it keeps us believing that we can control the uncontrollable. And that is a key component of our codependent thinking, that desire to control everyone and everything.

And that keeps us believing that if we are mean enough to ourselves, we can control the world and have some perfect fantasy life that plays out exactly to our specific specifications, instead of trusting the universe and the great unknown and that things are rolling out how they're meant to, and thereby allowing that process to unfold instead of trying to be the endless puppet master of it all.

Now, my darling, do I love every choice that I've made? For example, do I love that I stayed in an emotionally abusive relationship for many, many years? No. I don't love it. And having done all the work I have, I can accept it now because, well, frankly, because it happened. Right? It's a court-admissible fact that I stayed, and I don't need to beat myself up now for doing the best I could with the skills I had then, because I didn't know how to do life any differently until I did. And then, then I took action steps, lots and lots and lots of them, lots of coaching, lots of therapy, lots of somatic work, nervous system work, all the work to change my life.

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

And I get why stepping into acceptance and love for our past self for making choices we now don't like is scary at first. I hear this from my clients in Anchored all the time. They say, "I don't want to be kind to myself about the past choices that I don't like because I don't want to do it again." And we tell the story that we need to beat ourselves up in order to attempt to prevent present and future harms or missed steps. But that's the absolute opposite of what's real. It's when we are kind to ourselves that we make real, lasting, sustainable change. When we are most loving, compassionate, caring, and curious towards our past selves, that is when we can, in fact, do it differently the next time. Pinky promise. And for realises.

I'll also say this. Spending time and energy now beating up past you is a buffer. You heard me right. It's buffering behavior. Where buffering, as discussed in episode 14, is when we don't feel our feelings in this moment and instead do whatever is easiest for our nervous system as a distraction from feeling the feelings. So instead of feeling the guilt, the shame, the anger, the disappointment, frustration, et cetera, and process it through our bodies somatically, instead of actually being present with it, we beat ourselves up for it.

And can you see how that actually keeps you from doing the work you want to do to make change when you're so busy buffering against the feelings? Isn't that fascinating? Gosh, we think beating ourselves up does so much, so much good for us. It just, it does so much just the opposite of what we want.

Ep #339: Stop Hating Who You Used to Be: Countdown to End Emotional Outsourcing

So when we can show up for our inner children with compassion and care and can say, "I recognize and accept that I dated that person, took that job, said yes to that thing I didn't want to do, and that led to this pain for me, and I don't want to do it again. And what I am going to do is show up as my own most loving adult to repair my relationship with myself and my inner children. I'm going to actively choose right now to soothe myself, to meet myself with kindness."

It's from there that we can take stock of what we did, and we can take personal responsibility in a way that creates a pathway forward, instead of leaving us spinning in the past.

And these are the remedies, my love. More self-love, more compassionate, embodied self-responsibility, and more, deeper, always more self-acceptance. You were doing the best you could with the skills, tools, socialization, and conditioning you had at the time. And let me say it one more time, beating past you up, that serves no one and nothing in this world, my darling.

All right, my love, let's do what we do. Gentle hand on your heart should you feel so moved. And remember, you are safe. You are held. You are loved. And when one of us heals, we help heal the world. Be well, my darling. I'll talk to you soon.

Thank you for listening to this episode of Feminist Wellness. If you want to learn more all about somatics, what the heck that word means, and why it matters for your life, head on over to BeatrizAlbina.com/somaticswebinar for a free webinar all about it. Have a beautiful day, my darling, and I'll see you next week. Ciao.